Good evening, it is great to have you with us here on a Monday night. And we begin with breaking news in that international manhunt. Right here, recaptured after breaking free the first time. Authorities tonight believe this was where he emerged. The hole at the end of a mile long tunnel that began in that prison shower. And tonight the feds here in the US revealing the elaborate plots to bust him out of that maximum security prison may have started the moment he went in. ABC's Geo Venitas on the ground in Mexico leading us off tonight.

Tonight, police searching pipes, cars and packed buses, searching for Joaquin Guzan, known as El Chapo, the Shorty, a billion dollar man, responsible for a quarter of the drugs in the US and long wanted by US authorities. The man escaping from this maximum security prison, 55 miles outside of Mexico City Saturday! He was last seen in the shower area of the cell around 8:50 PM. Authorities say he fled thru a dugout hole, just 20 inches by 20 inches wide, Authorities finding a ladder, they believe, he used to drop himself 30 feet below ground. The passage, about as tall as Chapo himself, 5 feet 6 inches, but well-lit and fully ventilated with PVC piping. The passage even outfitted with a motor cycle, used to help move earth and dig the tunnel out. This is the hole, they believe, he escaped from. "This is a man that is known for having a team of engineers and miners, some of the best in the Mexico who are there just to build these tunnels." He has escaped before and was on the run for 13 years until his capture last year. The government had promised he would never escape again. And tonight, sources tell us that US officials knew about possible escape plans from just about the day El Chapo was captured.
